

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

Joseph E. Brenner, M.A., CPATH Director, is a nationally recognized educator and an effective advocate for public policies and private sector initiatives to promote social and economic justice. Working with the Service Employees International Union, he was instrumental in promoting and preserving public health standards and programs across the United States. As national education director for the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, he provided strategic and programmatic assistance to unions nationally. As Assistant Executive Director of an AFL-CIO Central Labor Council, Joe Brenner launched an innovative, successful, nationally recognized collaborative multi-union organizing effort that won union organizational rights for thousands of workers at the San Francisco International Airport, and served as a model for organizing campaigns across the nation. He has also directed the implementation of organizing efforts, linking organized labor and community efforts to win public policy initiatives that will result in the equitable distribution of economic development activities, including the promotion of standards to protect the rights of workers, the creation of affordable housing, and the creation of family wage jobs. He was principle author of the section on labor in the Fact-Finding Mission report on privatization of water in Ghana, and has written on cross-border communications between Mexico and the U.S. following the implementation of NAFTA. He holds a Masters Degree from the School of International Service at American University.

Luca Fanelli, who received his M.A. in history at the University of Turin, wrote The Choice for Land. Study of a Rural Settlement of the Movimento Sem Terra in Brazil, published in Italy. Besides the peasant movement and rural development studies, he has written articles on the matter of using photography as historical source.

Richard L. Harris is Professor of Global Studies and World Languages and Cultures at California State University, Monterey Bay. He holds a Ph.D. in Political Science from the University of California, Los Angeles, and has taught, carried out research, and directed programs at various universities, including the University of California, Harvard University, California State University, the Universidad Autónoma Metropolitana in Mexico City, the Universidad de Chile, the Universidad Nacional de Santiago del Estero in Argentina, and the University of Ibadan in Nigeria. He is one of the coordinating editors of Latin American Perspectives and the Editor of the Journal of Developing Societies. Professor Harris has published books, monographs and journal articles on African politics, Latin American politics, the politics of the Third World, revolutionary change, socialism and democracy.

Robert Huesca (Ph.D. Ohio State University) is Associate Professor in the Department of Communication at Trinity University in San Antonio, Texas. His research interests include alternative media and participatory communication for social change. His research on international and development communication issues has been published in a number of books and journals, including Communication Studies, Gazette, Journal of Communication, Media, Culture & Society, and the Handbook of International and Intercultural Communication.

Jorge Nef is Professor of Latin American, Caribbean and Latino Studies, and Political Science at the University of South Florida (USF) in Tampa and has been Professor of Politics, International Development and Rural Extension Studies at the University of Guelph. A graduate of the University of Chile and a Ph.D. in Political Science (UCSB), he has been a Visiting Professor in many Canadian and foreign universities and institutes. He has done work in a wide array of subjects: development, democratization, administrative reform, international relations, technology, food security, ethics, violence, and human rights. He has been Vice President of the Chilean College of Public Administrators and President of the Canadian Association of Latin American and Caribbean Studies (CALACS), and the recipient of numerous teaching awards.

His has written over a dozen books and monographs, and edited collections, while contributing over one hundred articles to refereed journals, edited books and to other national and international publications. His book Human Security and Mutual Vulnerability appeared in 1999. He has worked with national and international development agencies in Latin America and the Pacific. He has been the Director of the School of Government, Public Administration and Political Science at the University of Chile and is currently the Director of Latin American, Caribbean and Latino Studies at USF.

Roy C. Nelson, an Associate Professor of International Studies at Thunderbird, the Garvin School of International Management, received his B.A. in International Relations with honors from Stanford University. He has an M.A. in International Relations from Yale University, and an M.A. and Ph.D. in Government from Cornell University. He has published articles in a number of journals as well as a book, Industrialization and Political Affinity: Industrial Policy in Brazil (Routledge 1995). He is currently working on a comparative study of investment promotion programs in developing countries.

Gary Prevost is a professor and former chair in the Department of Political Science at St. John's University in Collegeville, Minnesota. He has co-authored and co-edited numerous books on Central America, the Caribbean and Spain including Democracy and Socialism in Sandinista Nicaragua, The 1990 Elections in Nicaragua, The Undermining of the Sandinista Revolution, Cuba—A Different America, and Politics and Change in Spain. He is also co-author with Harry Vanden of Politics in Latin America: The Power Game. He has received numerous research grants including an NEH Summer Stipend and a Fulbright Central American Republics Research Grant.

Sarah Sarzynski, Ph.D. student in Latin American History at the University of Maryland, College Park, is currently writing her dissertation “Misery, Memory, and Tragedy: A History of Rural Social Activism in Northeastern Brazil.” It is about memory, identity, and the Ligas Camponesas. She received her M.A. in Latin American Studies from the University of Arizona (2001), and has recently presented a paper on U.S. representations of Northeastern Brazil from 1945 to 1985: “‘Cheaper than a Coke in a Swanky Hamburger Joint’ and ‘Other’ Discourses of Nordestinos During the Cold War” (2004).

Ellen R. Shaffer is a Director of the Center for Policy Analysis (along with Joe Brenner). The Center sponsors policy research and analysis on trade and health, and on access to health care. She also is a Director of the Center for Policy Analysis on Trade and Health (CPATH), which is a project of the broader Center, and explores the links between international trade agreements, vital human services and health. She is an Assistant Clinical Professor in the Department of Clinical Pharmacy at the University of California, San Francisco. She recently represented the American Public Health Association on an international fact-finding mission to investigate a proposal to privatize the water system in Ghana, and was lead author of a resulting report on public health impacts. She has written a proposal for a state-based universal health service, under a grant from the California Health Care Options Project. The proposal extends her work with U.S. Representative Barbara Lee on H.R. 3000, the U.S. Universal Health Service Act. She served as health policy advisor to U.S. Senator Paul Wellstone from 1992 to 1995, guiding staff work on national health care reform and for managed care patients’ rights. She previously negotiated health insurance benefits in major union contracts, as a senior research analyst for the national Service Employees International Union, and is a Certified Employee Benefits Specialist. Recent projects include a review of the literature on medication errors, research on deregionalization of neonatal intensive care units in California and nationally, a book chapter on the impact of the changing health care system on women with breast cancer, and studies on the implications of health care reform proposals for California immigrants and for other low-income workers. She has a M.A. in Public Health from the University of California at Berkeley, and completed a Ph.D. from the School of Hygiene and Public Health at Johns Hopkins University, with the benefit of a dissertation grant from the Agency for Health Care Research and Quality. She has served on the Governing Council and on the Joint Policy Committee of the American Public Health Association.

Harry E. Vanden teaches political science and Latin American studies at the University of South Florida, Tampa. He has studied, worked and lived in Latin America for many years. In the 1970s he was a Fulbright scholar in Peru and stayed on to work with the government of Juan Velasco Alvarado. He focused his studies on Nicaraguan and Central American politics during the eighties and early nineties. Other publications have focused on Latin American Marxism, the peasantry, Inter-American relations and terrorism. In addition to numerous articles and book chapters, he has published six books, including: National Marxism in Latin America, José Carlos Mariátegui's Thought and Politics; A Bibliography of Latin American Marxism ; with Gary Prevost, Democracy and Socialism in Sandinista Nicaragua; and with Gary Prevost, eds, Undermining the Sandinista Revolution. A second edition of Politics of Latin America: the Power Game, written with Gary Prevost, is now being prepared for Oxford University Press. He is a member of the editorial board for Globalizations. Recent research has focused on globalization and new political movements in Latin America.

Professor Vanden studied at the University of Madrid, Albright College and the Maxwell School of Syracuse University. He holds the Ph.D. from the New School University in New York City.

Alicia Ely Yamin, JD MPH is a human rights attorney with training in public health whose work focuses on the intersections of health, development policy and human rights, often with a particular focus on women's health and gender dimensions of policies. Yamin currently resides in Montevideo, Uruguay although she is an Instructor in the Department of Health Policy and Management at Harvard School of Public Health. From 1996 to 2002, Yamin was a Staff Attorney at the Law and Policy Project and an Assistant Professor at the Mailman School of Public Health at Columbia University. From 1999 to 2002, she was on a salaried field assignment for the Law and Policy Project in Lima, Peru, where she worked with a variety of different nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and universities on issues relating to health and human rights. Yamin participated in the founding and development of the "Program on Human Rights and Health" at APRODEH (Asociación pro Derechos Humanos), the largest human rights NGO in Peru. She continues to be a formal advisor to that Program as well as to other NGOs in the region. In the United States, Yamin is Vice-President of the Center for Economic and Social Rights and is on the advisory boards of Physicians for Human Rights and the Center for Policy Analysis on Trade and Health. Yamin has worked with human rights NGOs in a variety of Latin American countries for over fifteen years and has published widely on health and human rights in both English and Spanish. In 2001-02 Yamin was awarded the “Calderone Award for Outstanding Junior Faculty” by Columbia University for research on the human rights implications of health sector reform in Peru, the findings of which were just published in a book from the University of San Marcos Press (Lima, Peru).

Yamin is a graduate of Harvard College (summa cum laude, 1987); Harvard Law School (cum laude, 1991) and the Harvard School of Public Health (1996).

Robert P. Weber is an Associate Professor of political science at Saint John's University, Collegeville, Minnesota. He received his Ph.D. in 1976 from the University of Rochester, Rochester, New York and has taught classes in American politics at Saint John's since 1968. He served as a congressional fellow in 1977-78 in Washington, D.C., working for Congressman John Breckinridge and Senator Lee Metcalf. His publications include several articles on Congress and numerous book reviews on different facets of American politics.